

Churches Conservation Trust - Wiltshire Wards

The Churches Conservation Trust was established by the 1968 Pastoral Measure: Ecclesiastical, Church of England law which is also approved by Parliament, and they celebrated their 40th birthday in 2009.

For over 40 years, they have played a unique role in national life. Without us, over 340 irreplaceable historic buildings might have disappeared entirely. Instead many have once again become the focus of active community life.

The organisation started life as the Redundant Churches Fund, a unique partnership between Church, State and the Charity sector, which came about because of the tireless campaigning of passionate church enthusiasts in the 1960s.

Most notable amongst these was Ivor Bulmer-Thomas who not only founded the Trust but also set up its sister charity 'Friends of Friendless Churches', which to this day continues to save churches outside the remit of CCT such as those in Wales.

The 1960s were difficult days for historic churches. Many were falling into disrepair and some were threatened with demolition at a time when historic buildings were sometimes seen as an impediment to progress.

No mechanism or organisation existed for caring for churches where parishes felt they could no longer afford to keep going. If it hadn't been for the commitment of local communities and national campaigners such as Ivor, many of the historic churches we know and love today might have been lost.

The first church saved by CCT was St Peter's, Edlington in the coalfields of South Yorkshire. The church had had its roof and windows removed in an attempt to turn it into a ruin. It was a Grade I Medieval church in a disadvantaged area with few other historic or community buildings. It is now a highly valued community and arts building, regularly used by local schools and colleges.

For more information about the Churches Trust and what they do please visit their website.

Currently there are 21 Churches in the county of Wiltshire that are in the care of the Church Trust.

The information in this document is mainly sourced for the website of the Churches Conservation Trust above.

Fisherton Delamere - St. Nicholas

The church of St. Nicholas stands on a hillside surrounded by a very pretty churchyard commanding beautiful views across the Wylve valley.

The church is often used as a stopping point for walkers in the area. There has been a church on this site since Norman times and the Font dates from that period. The building as seen today is of 14th century construction and later almost totally rebuilt during the 1800s in the Medieval Style recycling much of the original materials. The exterior has a chequerboard pattern to its walls and is built of flint and stone, a typical feature of many churches in this part of Wiltshire. The Tower is a square embattled structure with pinnacled corners The interior is light and airy. In 1912 the architect F. C. Eden was commissioned to design a rood screen and other woodwork in the church, the screen remains unpainted since it was very unpopular with parishioners. One memorial in the church leaves the reader touched with emotion, it is a memorial to two infants of Thomas and Joan Crockford who was vicar here in the 17th century. The memorial shows one child in its bed and another wrapped in a shroud.

The church of St. Nicholas is a Grade II* listed building. It was declared redundant on 1 June, 1982 and was vested in the Trust on 30 October, 1984.