THE antient and authentick record of Domesday Book having been universally esteemed the foundation of English property, the origin from whence Antiquaries have commenced their enquiries, and beyond which it is almost useless for them to search; the following extract is now offered to the Public, chiefly with the view of encouraging and promoting a general History of Wiltshire; such an extract being the groundwork on which all our provincial Histories must be erected.

Though the labour of transcribing and translating the original text was of the dullest nature, yet the Editor cheerfully entered upon the task, with a full conviction of its utility, and with the pleasing expectation that he may, in consequence of it, soon see a History of his native County.

How far the Editor has succeeded in his attempt to apply the modern names to the antient, must be left to the judgment of his readers. He, by no means, considers the scheme perfect, though he has spared neither pains nor enquiries to render it so. The difficulties of forming an Index, of this kind, were greatly enhanced by the circumstance of the Hundreds of this County being omitted in Domesday. For, unfortunately, the Manors and Estates in Wiltshire are not therein arranged under their respective Hundreds, as they are in many other Counties, and, therefore, it was sometimes necessary for the Editor, to search the county at large, for a synonymous appellation, when, if the place had been allotted to it's proper Hundred, the description alone might have immediately led him to it's certain discovery.

The names of Winterbourn, Clive, Langford, &c. &c. so frequently occur in Domesday, and are still so frequently found in various parts of this County, that it would be incumbent on an Editor to be intimately acquainted with the actual survey of every parish, and even of it's partial divisions, before he could pretend to apply such names, with precision, to their respective situations. But this difficulty may, in a great measure, be remedied with the assistance of the present proprietors, who, by solely confining their enquiries to their particular estates, may, with some degree of certainty assign the descriptions to their original districts. The general description will often be sufficient for that purpose, but when the circumstance of a neighbouring Wood, or of a Church, is annexed to it, the application may be made with tolerable accuracy.

As it may be acceptable, and even necessary to some of my readers to be informed of the explanation of certain words in Domesday, I shall endeavour to explain those, that constantly occur in each section of the Book, and that, now, are either obsolete, or are only to be found in our Glossaries. And even the Glossaries give such various interpretations of them, particularly with respect to their measurement, that I must assume the liberty of adopting those only that may be most consonant with my own ideas. However, I shall not attempt to advance any construction, that may not be warranted by some authority, though I shall not trouble the reader with citing the opinion of Littleton, Skinner, Spelman, or other Antiquaries on the occasion.

The first word that occurs in every description, is Hida. All our old Antiquaries, hitherto, have uniformly agreed that Hida and Carucata are synonymous terms: that Hida was the Saxon appellation for a certain and fixed number of acres, and that Carucata was the Norman. But this definition will, by no means, agree with the following extract, for though Hida and Carucata are both mentioned in almost every article, it seldom happens that they ever perfectly accord; and, sometimes, they so very widely differ, that no ingenuity of argument can possibly reconcile them to even the appearance of the same standard. I shall, therefore, notwithstanding such high authorities, though with due deference to them, consider Hida as the valuation of the estate, and Carucata as the measurement of the land. In the same manner, as we now say, that the modern Land tax is at so many shillings in the pound, according to the rent or value of the estate; so, formerly, the antient Danegeld (which was also a Land tax) was an assessment at so many shillings by the Hide.

I shall only produce one proof among many, from the Book of Domesday itself, that this must be the proper distinction between Hida and Carucata, where a particular estate consisted of the measurement of four carucates, and yet was assessed at four hides in the time of the Confessor, but which four carucates was reduced to the assessment of two Hides at the time of the Conqueror's survey.

With this construction the Sections in Domesday will be intelligible, but, without it, no sense could be extracted from them, and the whole would be contradiction and confusion.

I shall therefore make no scruple to define Hida to be an uncertain portion of land, that might annually be worth about twenty Norman shillings: and as the value depended upon the quality of the land, it consisted accordingly of a greater or less number of acres, in proportion to their poverty or fertility.

An objection may arise to this definition, that the value of the estate doth not always agree with the assessments, neither in the time of Edward the Confessor, nor in that of William the Conqueror. But to this I answer, that the assessments were made prior to either of their times (for the origin of Danegeld is of a more antient date than even the Confessor's reign), and many of them might not have been altered, though the Lands had been either improved or depreciated in their value. And this seems to be the case, for it appears, that no new general assessment was made by William, though many of the lands are valued at a much higher rate in his survey, than they were in the reign of his predecessor. A similar instance occurs in the present Land tax, where the original assessment of the last Century still continues, though the rents of the estates are indisputably improved, at least a fourth part, since the commencement of the tax.

Carucata is a Ploughland, which latter word is still, I believe, sometimes to be found in this county. The modern term, as well as the ancient, applies to arable land only. The measurement of the Carucata is somewhat arbitrary, and differs considerably, not only in different Counties, but even in the different districts of the same County. In some parishes, it is no more than 100 acres, while in others it may be 140. I shall therefore take it upon an average at 120. But where the term Ploughland is still used, it may naturally be considered as the original Carucata, and, consequently, at least in the parish using the term, it's just measurement may be ascertained.

Virgata is a Yardland, and consists of 25 to 35 acres, being the fourth part of a Carucata. As the Yardland is in very common use throughout this County, the measurement of the old Virgata may easily be fixed in the different manors, and by a multiplication of 4, that of the Carucata may also be known.

Bovata is an Oxcgang, and is the half of a Yardland, and the eighth part of a ploughland. It must be observed, that, whenever any of the foregoing terms occur, they all relate to arable lands.

I shall now proceed to the Holders of the various parts of the Manor. The Lord himself kept the dominium, or demesne, in his own hands, which was overlooked by the Servi, or Servants, who were actually annexed to the Manor, and were considered as a portion of it.

The other parts were allotted to the Villani, Bordarii, Coliberti, Coscez, and Cotarii, who, on account of the lands which were assigned to them, were obliged by their tenures to perform the various offices which the demesne lands required.

Money being exceedingly scarce at that period, no rents in money could be expected from the lands, and the profits, accruing from them to the Lord, were the simple produce of the demesne, which he might either consume at the Manor House, or otherwise dispose of, according to his inclination. The Mills, however, seem to be an exception to this rule, as an annual rent was paid for them to the Lord. The profits, arising from the Mills, must have been certain and considerable, as their rents, generally, appear to be, beyond all proportion, higher than the value of the other parts of the estate. Perhaps, the Tolls of the Mills, and the general necessity of bread, of which their could be no fear of a sale, made the payment of money easy.

The Villani, who were the originals of our present Copyholders, held their lands by doing the services of husbandry on their Lord's demesne, which were, in after times, commuted for what is now called a Quit rent. The word Villain being, at this time, always understood in an ill sense, I shall, on that account, use in the translation Villager, instead of it.

The Bordarii were also holders of land by particular services, though it is not precisely known what those services were. The name, indeed, seems to indicate an obligation to supply the Lord with provisions of some kind or other.

The Coliberti are supposed to be fishermen, and were, probably, obliged to provide fish for the Lord's table: and, I think, this land holder is never mentioned, but in those manors wherein is a river.*

* I have found reason, since the printing part of the following sheets, to retract my opinion with respect to the interpretation of

Coliberti;

Cofcez and Cotarii have been considered by our Antiquaries as synonymous terms, who define them to be Cottagers, occupying small quantities of land, the possession of which required them to supply the Lord with poultry, eggs, and other menial provisions. But, that there was some distinction between the Cofcez and Cotarii will be clearly visible from the following extract, in which they are sometimes distinguished with as much precision, as the Villani and Bordarii. It may appear, at the first sight, that one of these words might denote the Cottage, and the other the Cottager; this, indeed, will not agree with the text: but as I cannot pretend to mark out the difference between them, I must be contented, with the authority of our Glossaries, to class the Cofcez and Cotarii under one and the same name of Cottager.

Coliberti; for, on re-perusing them, I have observed that Coliberti are noticed among other holders in some manors, where no appearances of a river ever existed. I must therefore beg the reader to substitute the the word Freedmen, for Fishermen, whenever the latter occurs in the translation, as I now conceive that Coliberti may be understood in the sense, that such holders might have been freed from their servitude by their Lords, but on some certain conditions, that might distinguish them from the Liberi, or real Freemen.

The Meadows, the Pasture, the Woods, and the Vineyards, are described in Domesday by terms, different from those of the arable land. The most comprehensive word that we meet with, is

Leuca, which, from comparing the various opinions of our Etymologists, I am inclined to interpret a mile and a half.

Quarantena is a furlong, twelve of which compose a Leuca, and this circumstance seems to corroborate the opinion that Leuca is a mile and a half.

Arpenna, the measure of which is not decidedly known, is generally applied to Vineyards, and perhaps may be something less than an acre.

The distinction between Meadow and Pasture, in Domesday, is, that Meadow is appropriated to those grass grounds that were mowed, and Pasture to those which were fed.

Having thus attempted to explain the different terms mentioned in a section of Domesday, it may be thought incumbent upon me to say something with respect to the conclusion of each article, wherein is estimated the annual value of the Manor. In order to understand this valuation properly, the reader must first know, that the Norman pound was actually a pound weight of silver, and that it was divided into 20 (perhaps nominal) nominal) shillings ; each shilling being equal in weight to three of our present shillings, as was the Norman pound equal in weight to three of our modern pounds. Therefore, to make the value of the lands perfectly intelligible, we must multiply the antient valuation by three, by which the money of those days will be nearly brought to the same sterling standard, as the present coin.

We must next proceed to ascertain, as well as we are able, the proportionate value that money bore at that distant period, to what it does at the present instant : though, I am afraid, to do this with any degree of accuracy, will be attended with almost insuperable difficulties.

The usual method of making this estimate, has generally been, to form a comparison between the the prices of wheat at the two periods. But this must be exceedingly fallacious, as nothing fluctuated so much, in those early times, as the value of corn. We sometimes find the price of wheat, by the load, under ten shillings (of the present standard), and, perhaps, in the following year at the enormous price of twenty pounds, and in the next season again reduced to less than ten shillings.—When the difference of the value of money is considered, the sum of 20*l.* for a load of wheat must appear incredible, and if the concurrent testimony of all the Historians of those times did not agree in such a fact, we might even doubt the possibility of it.

It is no part of my plan to explain the causes of these extraordinary variations; though those, who are conversant in the early history of this kingdom, will, probably attribute them to the imperfect skill of our ancestors in husbandry, to their little prescience in guarding against the inclemencies of seasons, to their improvidence in disposing of their corn at the first opportunity, and chiefly, perhaps, to the turbulence of their times, when property had, scarcely, any other security than the personal strength of it's possessor. It is enough for me to have proved, that the difference in the value of money is not to be discovered by the comparative prices of wheat.

The price of cattle will neither assist us much in the present speculation; for though this was not in so fluctuating a state as that of corn, (owing, perhaps, to the little art which was necessary to produce and rear them) yet we cannot rely on the difference of value between a fat ox at the time of the Conquest, and a fat ox of our own times: It was then valued at about seven or eight shillings (of our present standard), which would carry the difference of the value of money greatly greatly beyond my estimation of it, and greatly beyond the truth. I must, however, observe that the breed of cattle is considerably enlarged, and, probably, a fat ox, formerly, might not have half the quantity of meat, as a common ox now has. But even this reduction will not be sufficiently low for my estimate, though it may, in some degree, render it probable, when we advert that meat has been advanced in price, in a greater proportion than any other article.

If any circumstance could tend to bring this subject to a demonstration, it would be the price of labour, which, we may naturally suppose, must have been at all times sufficient for the daily support of the labourer. But as labourers for hire were unknown at the time of the survey; we must advance somewhat forward in the English History, before we can make any discovery of that nature. The earliest authentick account, that I have been able to meet with, of the settled price of labour, is to be seen in Fleetwood's Chronicon preciosum, p. 129; where, in the year 1351, the daily pay of a labourer appears to have been legally fixed at one penny and a halfpenny, or nine pence by the week, which, regulated by our present standard, would be one shilling and ten pence. Now, I think a fair conclusion may be made, that in the space of near 300 years, the price of labour might be doubled, and, consequently, that labour might have been worth, at the time of the survey, eleven pence of our money by the week.

If we can thus discover the proportion between the price of labour at that period, and at the present, we may, probably, not be far from solving the question. I shall take it for granted, that the general price of labour is now seven shillings a week, and therefore, as eleven pence is to seven shillings, so will be the difference of the value of money, between the time of the survey, and the present period. It will appear, by this calculation, that the difference is something more than seven and a half, and that we must multiply the valuations in Domesday by twenty-two and a half (the pounds in Domesday being equal in weight to three sterling pounds) before we can pretend to form any judgment of the value affixed to the estates described in that book.

I am aware, that the value, thus multiplied, will be far from being adequate to the present rents of the estates; though, perhaps, if no improvements of any kind had been made in husbandry, and the original erroneous mode of cultivation had been implicitly continued, it might not have been greatly wide of the truth, truth, even at this day. But I shall, presently, enter a little more largely on this subject.

As I have quoted Fleetwood on the subject of a labourer's pay in 1351, I must take some notice of an inference which he draws from Ingulphus (who wrote in the time of the Conqueror), and which implies a contradiction to the quotation above mentioned. The inference is, that the daily pay at the time of the Conqueror was three halfpence, which was equal to four pence halfpenny of our money.

He says, at page 124 of the Chronicon, from Ingulphus, "that all the men of Croyland, who will have " any turf out of the Abbot's marsh, must either work
 " a day's work, or give three halfpence for one to cut
 " turves for Croyland Court." This would render the small pay of 1351 incredible: but the passage seems to be carelessly understood by Fleetwood, for it appears in the original, that these three halfpences were a fine or penalty upon the Tenants of the Abbey, for non-performance of their duty, and not a composition for others to do it for them; and, probably, the fine was so heavy, that it was seldom or never incurred. Besides, the Abbot himself was to receive two thirds of it, and the other part was allotted to increase the maintenance of the Chaplains of the Monks. This proves that the money could not be appropriated for the pay of another.

It is probable, that the knowledge of agriculture remained stationary till the reign of Henry the eighth, or perhaps of Queen Elizabeth (at the latter end of whose reign money was brought to the same standard as at present), and that, consequently, the value of the manors continued of the same estimation from the time of Domesday to that period, a proper allowance being only made for the increasing plenty of money. In the sixteenth century, the improvement of lands began to be studied, but the progress of improvement was extremely slow, and we may assert, that it did not arrive to any considerable degree of perfection, till the restoration of Charles the second; since which æra, the conversion of pasture lands into meadows, by the means of draining and drowning; a superior skill in the management of woods; the profitable doctrine of manures; and, in later times, the universal introduction of artificial grasses upon our arable lands, which are now scarcely ever in waste, and which are even enriched by their intermediate produce—have improved the estates in so wonderful a manner, that we may safely assert, that the present produce arising from them, and consequently their intrinsic value, has been, at least, trebled, since the commencement of the last century, in this kingdom, even though we should suppose no variation in the value of money; and that the tenants, though their rents have increased in the same proportion, have, notwithstanding, much better bargains at this time; live more comfortably; acquire more profits, and even pay their rents better, than they did at any prior period.

I shall endeavour to illustrate this assertion, by extracting a particular manor from Domesday; and, as I shall estimate the measures and the present value of it, by the rules above adopted, they will, if they should be well founded, not only ascertain the modern worth of the manor, but will also prove the precision, with which the surveyors, employed by William the Conqueror, executed their commissions.

I shall extract for this purpose, the manor of Odstock, near Salisbury, now the property of the Earl of Radnor; because, till within these four years (since which time a bill for inclosing the manor has passed) it probably exhibited the same appearances, as it did at the original survey, and could not, from its local situation be otherwise benefited, except by the advantages it has received from an improved husbandry, and from the conversion of a considerable part of it's pasture into meadow.

It may be necessary, however, before I proceed, to remind the reader of my process in multiplying the original values, by so high a number as 67 and a half. The Domesday shillings and pounds are first multiplied by three, which will reduce the antient money to the present weight. The sum is then multiplied by seven and a half, to make it accord with the modern value of gold and silver. And to this I add another multiplication by three, because I suppose that the real and intrinsic value of the lands is, at this time, actually three times as much as formerly, without any consideration of the plenty or scarcity of money.

Having hinted, at the beginning of this preface, that the purport of the following publication was intended as an introductory prelude to a History of this County ; I am induced, though with the greatest diffidence, to offer a sketch, or general outline, for the completion of such a work.

It is well known, that Provincial Histories have been, oftentimes, checked or retarded by the consideration of the great labour, and of the heavy expence, that would necessarily attend them. Few people can be expected to engage in an operation, the trouble and expences of which would be certain, and the termination of which could scarcely be hoped for, during the existence of a single life. And where shall we find a man, whose abilities and circumstances might enable him, singly, to persevere in so complicated an undertaking? If a man of proper abilities should venture upon the work, and depend upon a common subscription to support it's expences, it is much to be apprehended, that few people would risque their subscriptions, on the precarious uncertainty of ever seeing the History ; particularly, as it would not only depend upon the honesty and industry of the undertaker, but would also be liable to a total miscarriage, by the intervention of death or illness, that might happen to him.

These hazards would, in my opinion, be removed, or, at least, greatly diminished by the following plan.

A general subscription to be opened, and no subscription to be less than 25l.

Every subscriber of 50l. to be entitled to one copy of the work, when published, and also to one copy for each other 50l. which he may chuse to subscribe. The profits arising from the publication, to be proportionably divided among all the subscribers in general.

A Committee of five, or more, to have the sole management and conduct of the work.

The subscription money to be lodged in the hands of a banker, and to be drawn for, as occasion may require, by the order of the Committee.

If any person should wish to recede from the Committee, or should, by any misfortune, be incapable of attending it; the remaining part of the Committee might elect another in his place. And as it does not seem necessary, that every committee man should be a subscriber (though, perhaps, the majority of them ought ought to be), some ingenious men might be admitted, to whom it might be inconvenient to subscribe, and whose assistance would be very useful and desirable. As soon as 1500l. or 2000l. should be subscribed, the Committee might immediately be chosen, either by the personal election, or by proxy, or by the recommendatory letters of the subscribers.

The Committee, when appointed, might elect their secretary, and proceed upon the work; and as they would soon engage, each in their respective departments, the most able Historians, Antiquarians, Draughtsmen, Herald, Botanists, Engravers, &c. &c.—it seems probable, that a History of a County, which has hitherto been considered as the labour of twenty or thirty years, might easily be effected within the short period of three or four.

And even this period might be shortened, if the Country Gentlemen could be persuaded, liberally to communicate abstracts of their antient deeds and papers, or, at least, suffer the Committee to employ proper persons to make such extracts from them, as might be necessary towards the perfection of the work.

It has been justly complained of in other counties, that papers of the utmost consequence to their histories, have, with an useless precaution, been timidly with-

holden from public inspection, under the futile idea that the titles of the proprietors might, by a free communication, be called in question ; but I have too good an opinion of my countrymen, to suppose them biassed by such unmanly sentiments, and am rather inclined to think, that every proprietor will willingly and joyfully contribute to the full completion of a work, in which every individual will be partly concerned.

Every one must naturally wish to see the history of his property traced to it's original holder, and no one would blush to know, that his present estate was, antiently, part of the possessions of the principal men in this kingdom.

It may, perhaps, be necessary to hint at the propriety, that the drawing and engraving of all private buildings should be executed at the expence of their owners ; but that public edifices, remarkable ruins, and curious churches or monuments, should be inserted in the work at the expence of the Committee. And it is to be hoped, that those Noblemen and Gentlemen, who might wish to have their seats introduced, may take the recommendation of their Draughtsman and Engraver from the Committee, that proper justice may be done to their places, and that the engravings may be a real ornament to the history.

If the general subscription should fall short of my expectation, which I can scarcely suppose, an open and common subscription might be proposed for the work, as soon as the number and value of the volumes can be known, and before any expences, attending the press, have been incurred ; the certainty of this future supply may enable the Committee to proceed in the History, even under the disadvantage of a present deficiency.

I shall only add, that the Editor of this volume will gladly contribute one hundred pounds, either in support of this plan, or of any other that may be better approved of by the County.

N. B. The original names are to be found in the first column, and the modern names in the second.

The larger figures, in the reference, direct the reader to the Proprietors of the land ; and the smaller figures, to the sections of that number, in which the place is described.

As it may be in the power of many of his readers to correct the errors, or supply the deficiencies of the Index, the Editor hopes that, by their kind assistance, it may be made complete.

Where the Q is introduced before the modern name, it is to be understood, that the Editor is either doubtful whether the application is just, or whether the place is to be found in the County.

I. THE LANDS OF THE KING.

1. The King holds Cauna. King Edward held it, and it was never assessed, and therefore it is unknown how many hides it may be worth. But there are 29 ploughlands; 8 of which and 8 servants are in demesne. Thirty-seven villagers, 78 borderers, and 10 coliberts occupy the other 21 ploughlands. Forty-five burgeses and 7 mills pay 4 pounds, 12 shillings, and sixpence. There are 50 acres of meadow, and the pasture is 3 miles in length, and a mile and a half in breadth. This town provides one night's entertainment for the King's household, with its usual customs. Nigellus holds the church of this manor with 6 hides of land under the King, where are 5 ploughlands, 2 of which and 6 servants are in demesne. Seven villagers, 2 borderers, and 11 cottagers occupy the other three. Here are 2 mills of the value of 20 shillings, and 25 burgeses pay 20 shillings.
